PRODUCTS LIABILITY

Can I Sue if I Was Burned by a Defective Product?

Consumers purchase and use many kinds of products each year. They also have the right to assume the products will work safely and as advertised. Unfortunately, unsafe products frequently find their way to the marketplace and cause harm to innocent workers, individuals, and families. There is a wide range of defective products that can cause electrical shocks, electrocution, fires or explosions either in a person's home or while using the product during the course of their employment. Electric heaters, air fryers, beauty products, commercial equipment, and defective industrial equipment can destroy property and cause painful and fatal injuries.

CPSC Approves Final Consumer Safety Standard to Prevent Furniture Tip-Overs

The Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC) recently voted to adopt mandatory safety standards to protect infants and young children from furniture tip-overs, which all too often culminate in serious injuries and fatalities. Tip-over injuries are typically associated with armoires, dressers, wardrobes, and other clothing storage units. The CPSC is aware of 234 deaths in the last 22 years that can be attributed to tip-over incidents; 199 were children.

WORKPLACE INJURIES

Preventing Toxic Exposure in the Workplace

The Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) estimates that the U.S. uses an excess of 86,000 types of chemicals to perform different tasks. For individuals who encounter chemical hazards and toxic substances in the workplace, this poses a unique health and safety risk. To protect these workers, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) has guidelines and standards in place so that employers take the necessary steps to safeguard employees from known and recognized hazards that they encounter on the job every day. Toxic substances and chemical hazards are substances that are capable of inflicting mild to severe harm to users, regardless of whether they have a preexisting allergy to the substance.
