

Winter Safety: Know Your Rights

Winter Weather Creates Serious Hazards

Recent snowstorms, blistering temperatures, and lingering ice have created dangerous walking and driving conditions across our region. Sidewalks have turned slick, parking lots are treacherous, and roadways remain unpredictable long after the snow stops falling. Unfortunately, these winter hazards often lead to preventable accidents — and serious injuries.

When winter weather strikes, safety doesn't become optional. Property owners and drivers alike have legal responsibilities to act reasonably and protect others from harm.

Worker Safety in Winter

Winter brings more than just cold temperatures — it creates dangerous working conditions for workers across many industries. Snow, ice, freezing rain, and subzero temperatures significantly increase the risk of on-the-job injuries, especially for workers who spend time outdoors or travel as part of their job.

Construction workers, delivery drivers, warehouse employees, utility workers, healthcare staff, and many others are expected to keep working despite hazardous winter weather. When employers push productivity while conditions worsen, injuries often follow. The good news is that injured workers have important legal rights.

Prepare Yourself and Your Vehicle for Bad Weather

Winter weather brings snow, ice, freezing rain, and dangerously low temperatures — all of which can turn an ordinary drive into a hazardous situation. Each year, winter storms contribute to countless preventable crashes, injuries, and fatalities. While not every winter accident can be avoided, proper preparation can significantly reduce your risk.

Knowing how to prepare both yourself and your vehicle before heading out can help keep you safe — and may also protect your legal rights if an accident occurs.
